

The Energy Law Report

EDITORIAL GUIDELINES

The Energy Law Report, published by LexisNexis, is a monthly subscription journal focused on alternative and traditional energy law issues, as well as the critical juncture where energy technologies and the environment intersect.

The Energy Law Report covers topics of interest to energy lawyers and law firms, in-house energy counsel, government lawyers, senior business executives in energy-related industries, and anyone interested in energy-related environmental preservation and the laws governing traditional and alternative energy technologies.

Published 10 times per year, The Energy Law Report delivers first rate analysis and commentary on:

- Traditional energy source law
- Alternative energy law
- Energy-related environmental law
- Regulatory developments/case law
- Energy finance
- Land use/environmental conservation efforts
- Energy business reorganizations/bankruptcies
- Intellectual property issues

The Energy Law Report is largely written by outside authors, primarily lawyers. It has regular columns, including “Legislative Update,” “Regulatory Update,” “From the Courts,” “International Perspectives,” “Industry News,” and a “Calendar of Events.”

Articles should be, at a minimum, approximately 2,500 words or so in length, including endnotes; longer articles – including much longer articles – are welcomed.

We accept articles that have not been previously published. However, authors and columnists may reproduce their articles and columns, and place them on their Web sites, with attribution to and after publication in The Energy Law Report.

Any energy law topic may be appropriate for an article for The Energy Law Report, and any perspective may work.

An article may discuss a transaction or matter in which the author has been involved so long as the author clearly discloses the involvement to the Editor-in-Chief and includes a reference to that involvement in the author’s bio.

In all instances, it probably is best to run an idea by the Editor-in-Chief before beginning to write; that way, we will not accept other articles on the same topic from someone else (unless perhaps the second author comes at the topic from a different angle).

All articles must be submitted via e-mail in Word, as an attachment. All charts, graphs, and tables should be typed or professionally typeset and must be submitted via e-mail.

Articles should not use extensive endnotes. Do not put citations in the text; rather, use endnotes only. Do not use short form citations, such as Id. and supra, or defined term citations (e.g., District Court opinion at...). Repeat entire full citation with all information, including pin cite, where applicable.

Articles should include a clearly written short author biography, author address, direct phone number, and e-mail address. Authors should provide a two or three sentence summary of the article.

Articles should be written in neutral, third-person voice. "You," "I," "We," and similar terms are discouraged.

Articles must appear as continuous prose, with full sentences. Outline format must be converted to ordinary paragraphs with transitional sentences. Authors' internal headings should not be relied on as the sole means of making points or transitions.

First reference to any persons should include full names. Authors are responsible for verifying correct spelling and titles. First references to entities should include the entity's full title, followed by the acronym (if any) that will be used throughout the rest of the article, in parentheses.

Excessive use of quotation marks should be avoided. They should not be used when referring to a few ordinary words of a speaker or writer. They are appropriate for coined phrases, but only those that are unfamiliar, and only on first reference.

Please let us know if you have any other questions on contributing to The Energy Law Report, or if you would like to discuss a particular topic in greater detail.

Thanks for your interest!
